Some Random Landscape Thoughts

Joshua Mitchell

A swimming pool is the ultimate backyard amenity.

It's the center of summer life and a strong aesthetic element that can be the focus of your entire landscape. When pools include water features, unique lighting, specialty materials and design features; they can have a powerful influence on the adjacent outdoor living spaces.

A traditional in-ground swimming pool is often the most expensive part of a new landscape. Swimming pools are consistent in their construction costs. The causes of variability are the many options possible for increasing their visual appeal or diversity. Your family and lifestyle will dictate what options are important to you personally and whether the cost for these upgrades are within your budget.

When it comes to swimming pools, the style options are unlimited.

By combining materials in unique combinations you can have a look that is all your own. A good starting point for selecting a pool style, is to look at the style of your home. Designing your new pool and your landscape area in a similar fashion will make it look as if it was there all along.

Since pools are expensive to build and sometimes even more expensive to remodel, it is important to give a lot of time to design. You'll only build it once, and therefore your choices of materials and detailing should be high quality and timeless so your pool design won't go out of style in the near future.
